Olivier Barlet : African Cinemas: Decolonizing the Gaze before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised African Cinemas: Decolonizing the Gaze:

The book is full of information but the organization of each chapter leaves something to be desired. He writes more as a reporter who tries to pack information and give all sides, with name dropping, than as a thoughtful scholar.

This book is both a personal journey and an introduction to the cinema cultures of Africa. A book about the politics of cultural survival, it is also a major overview of African cinema and television. The first part of the book traces the development of African cinema - from colonization to Afrocentrism. The author examines this development through a variety of fundamental themes: the decolonization of the imagination; the quest for legendary African origins and the mobilization of African cultural values. The second part of the book analyses specific films, particularly through narrative and in terms of their African specificity - in the use of silence, orality and humour. Finally, the author explores the social and economic contexts of the African cinema and television industry - including its often vexed relations with the West and the problems of production and distribution African film-makers face. Exploring the achievements and challenges of those who seek to affirm African cultural values through film, the book also covers the African television industry and African-American cinema. It includes interviews with film-makers, stills from the films and, ultimately, a plea for seeing and respecting the otherness of the Other. Winner of the French National Film Centre's best filmbook of 1997 and now available in four languages, this is book which takes us into a process of learning how to look.

". . .the reader will discover the book's depth and a wealth of information on the varied cinemas of Africa. . ." --
